Drax has £2bn plan for biomass power stations

- Plant would supply 3% of country's needs
- Siemens to provide turbine technology

Terry Macalister
The Guardian, Friday 24 October 2008
Article history

Drax Group, the owner of Britain's most carbon-intensive power station, is turning green with a £2bn plan to build the country's first large-scale biomass plants which burn plant-based materials.

more than 70 manufacturers of briquettes in the UK alone
Being an EWB volunteer gives you the space to think, connect ideas about development with realities and contribute to partner organisations mission. With GVEP International, I have had a chance to see how household energy services are really delivered to people in rural East Africa and how NGO interventions and private enterprises can influence the harnessing of effective energy technologies we have all heard of – solar, ICS, biomass, briquetting and small scale wind”.
